“Ireland’s economy took off when one thousand American multinational firms located there, lured by the government’s tax concessions, a well-educated young labour force and entry to the European market. On the back of that influx local enterprise began to establish itself, and the Irish came back. Kerala sits, like Ireland, on the edge of a huge market, and like Ireland, probably needs an initial boost from overseas to get it moving. It needs a few magnet corporations who might become the core of the sort of clusters that generate alchemy and more enterprises. The state has created a brand-new technology park but there is no queue yet to occupy it.”
